A comparative genomic hybridization (CGH) is a method used to detect and, to a certain extent, order regions of gains and losses of DNA sequences on a physical or metaphase chromosome. It is widely used in cytogenetic laboratories for the evaluation of genome, but its sensitivity is limited by the quantity of DNA required for CGH to work. We have determined why serial dilution of the probe DNA improves the sensitivity of CGH by the use of an experimental model that we call "comparative genomic hybridization with serial dilutions of the probe DNA". Q: Is it possible to specify a return type in `b1.contains(b2)`, where `b1` is an object and `b2` is a Collection
